Editorial Review

From the Back Cover

Corrections is a large component of the criminal justice process; a process that consists of an incredible complex and fragmented blend of many agencies and programs among federal, state and local jurisdictions.

The nation's prison and jail population has risen to a record 2,166,260 this past year. It is an increase that has come when crime rates appear to be falling. Yet the price of imprisonment of combined federal and state facilities has grown 2.6 percent. One out of every 143 residents of this country is behind bars. Our incarceration rates are the highest of any nation. Why? This work is neither a text written by one author nor is it primarily a reader, but rather a combination. It highlights those issues relevant to the study of corrections:

- history
- goals
- prisoner re-entry
- suicide
- religion
- mental illness
- technology
- alternatives
- constitutional rights
- building design
- women and minorities
- death penalty
- terrorism
- the future

We have gone from a philosophy of "hands-off" to "hands-on." Prisoners no longer have the status of "slave of the state." This text explains the relationships that exist in corrections from both an historical and twenty-first century point of view. Key Correctional Issues is an important work that presents a reference point allowing for future discussion.

About the Author

Dr. Roslyn Muraskin received her Ph.D. in criminal justice from the Graduate Center of the City University of New York. Her Masters' degree is from New York University, School of Government, and her B.A. degree is from Queens College, where she majored in Political Science-Speech. This work is not your typical Correctional Text. It is neither a text written by one author nor is it primarily a reader, but rather a combination. It highlights those issues relevant to the study of corrections, and is done so in a fashion that is not tedious to read.

Corrections continues to be a relevant part of the American Criminal Justice system. It is a complex system fragmented by many programs, agencies, and laws that govern both on the federal and local levels. Many of the facilities as they now exist are overcrowded, barbaric to an extent and have varying philosophies depending on who is in charge. Do we have correctional facilities to punish, to rehabilitate, to do both or neither? Is the death penalty fair and just? Are all "residents" of the correctional facilities treated equally or on a par with each other? Should they be?

If prisons are to rehabilitate then why do we have continued recidivism? Why are the sentences in this country longer than any other? and for what purpose? The public seems to know little about the correctional facilities other than the fact that this is where we send bad people. Yet, from a budgetary point of view, corrections is a low priority item. Are prisoners entitled to rights and which rights?

Our sentencing process is complex. If we assume that we are to punish all who break the law, why then is it not done on an equal basis? Accordingly "to begin at the elementary beginning, we have an almost entire absence in the United States of legislative determinations — of 'law' — governing the basic questions as to the purposes and justifications of criminal sanctions. Without binding guides on such questions, it is inevitable that individual sentences will strike out on a multiplicity of courses chosen by each decision maker ... The result can be chaos" (Krantz, 1983, pp. 7-8). This material written almost twenty years ago has not changed what goes on today.

Historically, the courts held that a prisoner had the status of "slave of the state" with no rights (Ruffin v Commonwealth, 62 Va. (2,1 Gratt) 790, 796, 1871 as found in Krantz). There existed a philosophy of "hands off." Members of the judiciary believed that once an individual was sentenced, it fell to the correctional officers to direct the activities of the inmates and determine the conditions of confinement. That philosophy ended when the courts recognized the atrocities that were present in the correctional facilities.

This text explains relationships that exist in corrections from both an historical and twenty-first century point of view. It discusses correctional issues, such as prisoner reentry, changing goals of corrections, suicide, religion, mentally disordered, technocorrections, constitutional rights of prisoners, alternatives to incarceration as well as the concerns of minority prisoners and the death penalty. Key Correctional Issues links important issues that present a reference point and allows for further discussion.

To all those who contributed to this text, my heartfelt thanks. Each has their own area of expertise, aid therefore bring to the forefront ideas that are fresh and exciting.

Many thanks to all my editors at Prentice Hall, including Sarah Holle, who is very dedicated and works so hard with each of her authors. Special thanks to Frank Mortirner, editor, who has been extremely patient with me while developing this text.
